Working in an oil and gas refinery involves supporting the safe and efficient processing of crude oil into usable products such as fuel, gas, and chemicals. Refinery workers assist in daily plant operations by monitoring equipment, pipelines, valves, pumps, and storage tanks to ensure smooth production. They carry out routine inspections, basic maintenance, cleaning, and housekeeping to keep the work area safe and operational. Employees follow strict HSE (Health, Safety, and Environment) procedures, attend toolbox talks, and wear PPE at all times to prevent accidents. They support shutdown, startup, and maintenance activities, including assisting technicians, mechanics, and operators during repair works. Refinery staff help with material handling, loading and unloading of chemicals and equipment, and ensure proper waste disposal according to environmental standards. They report equipment faults, leaks, or unsafe conditions immediately to supervisors and assist in emergency response drills such as fire, gas leak, and evacuation procedures. Good teamwork, discipline, and following instructions are essential. Working in a refinery requires physical fitness, alertness, and the ability to work shifts in a high-risk industrial environment while maintaining productivity and safety standards set by companies
