The duties of a pump operator encompass various precise technical and field aspects, most notably: Operation and Monitoring: The role begins with starting up the pumps and regulating material flow based on required specifications. This includes monitoring pressure gauges, temperatures, and flow rates to ensure the system remains within safe operating limits. Preventive Maintenance: The work is not limited to operation; it extends to periodic equipment inspections, lubricating moving parts, and replacing damaged seals to prevent leakage, thereby extending the equipment's lifespan. Troubleshooting: An operator must possess a technical sense to detect abnormal noises or vibrations that may indicate an imminent malfunction, allowing for swift intervention and repair before the problem escalates. Safety and Documentation: Strict adherence to occupational safety standards and wearing personal protective equipment (PPE) is essential, along with accurately recording daily data in logbooks to track system performance.

This role requires physical stamina, blueprint reading, and quick thinking for emergencies. As the "heart" of the system, the operator ensures seamless operations; their keen observation is vital for success and avoiding losses
